MANAGER'S COMMENTARY

Given that major stock market levels ended up the month not far from where they started it and, in the case of Japan, actually rising, one could be forgiven for being under the impression that April had been pretty uneventful.

However, the reality is that markets were extremely volatile following President Trump's 'Liberation Day' announcements on tariffs, which impacted every country in the world to varying degrees. Markets initially fell following this, and the short term pick up in volatility also affected the US government bond markets, as yields there rose.

Despite the latter most probably being due to technical issues relating to futures' margin, the combined effect of US equities and bonds falling together finally prompted action from the President. There followed a series of qualifications and caveats in certain sectors and a delay to the most extreme levels of tariffs, albeit with a blanket 10% level remaining in place. The effect of this was to lead the S&P 500 to end the month less than 1% below its starting level.

However, one lingering impact of Trump's policies, whether this be due to approach or attitude, was to leave the US dollar significantly weaker than where it had been; down 3% against the pound. Conversely, the Euro rose significantly, as we saw an allocation of assets away from the US to Europe, the latter market significantly ahead of the US now since the start of the year as investors look to economic stimulus from increased spending by the incoming German government and on the regions' defence. These movements in currency can have a marked impact on returns from UK investors, as holding assets in a region with a weakening currency reduces returns and vice versa.

Bond markets soon stabilised following the retractions on tariffs and many areas of this asset generated positive returns for investors over the month. Of particular interest was the high yield area of the market. One would expect this higher credit risk area of the market to be susceptible to concerns over economic growth, which the tariffs represent. However, whilst we initially saw an increase in the yield spread over treasuries, these too narrowed again somewhat as the month progressed.

The disparate nature of asset returns and currencies recently has demonstrated the requirement to diversify portfolios both within the US and in many cases globally. Whilst the tariffs have been delayed for 90 days, as we move closer to the expiry of the delay we can expect volatility to be evident in markets. The extent of this will be dependent on what deals are announced, and to what extent globally, between now and then. Meanwhile, portfolio diversification remains important.
